

Broken Prison System Helps No One Hardworking Citizens Have the Right to Ask For a System That Can Be Efficient and Gives Help to the Neediest

I killed an innocent man by drinking and driving. As a result, many lives were ruined. I feel deep pain and remorse. I have had a lot of time to evaluate the state's prison system, which is the largest drain on California's economy without having to be accountable to the taxpayer.

The hardworking citizens, struggling to put children through school while at the same time protecting them, should have some expectations as to what is being done with money that is being diverted from schools, universities and hospitals to lock up California's criminals. There are none.

Prison officials tell you, Joe Public, that inmates are being rehabilitated so you will be safer when they return to your communities, that these men will have the skills to remain drug-free and find jobs. Wrong. Most of the men being released from California's prison system are men who are more dangerous than when they arrived. I say a silent prayer as I watch them leave, hoping they will not cross the paths of my wife and children.

While there are limited programs available to help men change the direction of their lives, the backlog is so long that men returning to the free world often never make it in time. The prison system seems so concerned with funding these programs that they fill the majority of slots with lifers instead of men who are close to returning to society.

Prior to the accident that killed Mr. Rizzo, Frank Sinatra's longtime sidekick, I was a successful businessman. Since my incarceration, I have completed every self-help program available within the prison environment and several via correspondence, as well as vocational training programs.

After being transferred to the California Substance Abuse Treatment Facility and State Prison at Corcoran, along with many lifers, we were told that regardless of what we had previously done, all of us were being placed in vocational trade instruction because the warden wanted to ensure funding.

I asked for special consideration given the fact that I have substantial education and arrived with a letter of recommendation outlining the several mental health and literacy programs that I conducted at Tehachapi Prison. I suggested that I could be used to help send safer men back into society. My request to establish programs was denied and I was placed in Janitorial Vocational Training. I am currently taking a seat away from one of the hundreds of men on the yard that need job training. I am not alone. Throughout the state, the prison system has filled these programs with men that may never go home instead of providing the training to those that need it to care for their families upon release.

All of the alcohol and drug abuse programs at this substance abuse treatment facility are filled with lifers, making it impossible for those who will be returning to society to get counseling. Are you safer? No. You are getting nothing for the billions that are being stolen from your children.

As I sit in this vocational class, I can't help but think of a person in the yard who truly wants a way to change his life and get away from crime in order to feed his family, but cannot. I have his seat. Dr. Jeff Perrotte is being trained as a janitor so you will be safer and I will be more parole suitable.

That is an outrageous waste of your tax dollars and an outrageous indifference to your safety by the California Department of Corrections.
